Celebrating silver jubilee of Youm-e-Takbeer

It is great to see the whole nation observing Youm-e-Takbeer with national zeal and fervour to commemorate the historic nuclear tests at Chaghi, Balochistan, the same day of May 28, in 1998. On this day, Pakistan became the seventh nuclear power of the world with a demonstration of nuclear capabilities and the first in the Muslim world after conducting nuclear tests at Chaghai in Balochistan on 28th May 1998 as a response to India's nuclear bomb tests on 11th and 13th May of the same year at Pokhran in the Rajasthan state of India.

Undoubtedly, the successful tests made Pakistan's defense invincible. Different programmes and ceremonies were arranged to mark the celebrations of the historic day. Special prayers were offered in the morning for the progress and prosperity of Pakistan, the supremacy of the constitution, and the eradication of terrorism.

In his message on Youm-e-Takbeer, the Prime Minister Muhammad Shehbaz Sharif said the nation would have to move ahead with the same spirit to attain economic sovereignty and self-dependence.

He expressed the determination that with unity, hard work and staunch faith, we would turn Pakistan into an economic power.

The Prime Minister said twenty-five years ago to day, the people of Pakistan announced the invincibility of their defence by detonating five nuclear explosions in response to India's nuclear explosions.

Moreover, the armed Forces of Pakistan have paid a rich tribute to the brilliant minds that conceived and achieved this accomplishment under daunting challenges. In a statement, the Inter Services Public Relations (ISPR) said entire Pakistani nation celebrates the Silver Jubilee of Youm-e-Takbir today and commemorates the mum Deterrence. The program was started though with limited resources but insurmountable will and passion to ensure that the country becomes a sovereign and strong state unable to be bullied by the hostile powers.

remarkable achievement of establishing Credible Mini-

Dreams of Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto as well as the nation came true in 1998 when the then Prime Minister Muhammad Nawaz Sharif stood firm against all threats to include Pakistan in the nuclear club by detonating device at Chagai. It was the will and determination of our nation and the leadership that removed all hurdles on way to achieving this milestone. President Ziaul Haq was also less to none in taking forward the nuclear program initiated by Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto and despite all reservations, the nation cannot ignore his contribution.

The nation is also indebted to Shaheed Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, the founder of Pakistan's nuclear programme and also pays rich tributes to Benazir Bhutto Shaheed who, as an opposition leader backed prime minister Nawaz Sharif's decision of nuclear tests in 1998. The armed forces of the country had rendered valuable services for the country's nuclear programme which had been a golden chapter in its history. Credit of the indigenous nuclear programme also goes to Dr Abdul Qadir Khan, (Mohsin e Pakistan), all scientists, engineers and other individuals who contributed to Pakistan's atomic proramme. The mountains of Chagi still echoed with the same resolve, and Balochistan province still bore distinction with regard to defence of the country don't know how old I was, or where I was, when I read Are You There God? It's Me Margaret by Judy Blume but I do remember feeling understood. The novel's protagonist, Margaret, moves to a new town and is keen to fit in; she joins a 'secret club' where the 12-year-old girls talk about things crushes, their developing bodies and getting their first periods. But there's also pressure for Margaret, an interfaith child, to choose which parent's religion to follow. She's too nervous to admit to her friends she talks to God about her fears and concerns, and her crushes. "Are you there, God? It's me, Margaret. I just did an exercise to help me grow. Have you thought about God? About my growing, I mean," she asks.

While I did not speak to God, like many kids who grew up reading Blume, I could relate Margaret, even though she was a white girl in suburban US. Margaret was grappling with a host of issues that adolescence brings feelings of inadequacy, not feeling seen or heard, not knowing who to talk about puberty.

I was reminded of all these forgotten feelings ing up was a serious matin the documentary Forter but didn't talk down ever Judy Blume availto her readers. It is the most poignant part of Judy Blume Forever because you see just how comfortable kids were to tell her their March in a Florida secrets, feelings of confusion, isolation and other serious problems they faced. Blume responded to many in a non-judgmental, caring manner.

All parents can learn from Blume's advocacy for children; to see things from their perspective, to let them read books they want without fear of them turning wayward; to let them grow into their weird wonderful selves. And especially talk to them about adolescence and puberty in an honest manner that ensures they grow up to have healthy relationships. My experience, based on conversations with university students, is that such topics are deemed too taboo to discuss openly, or worse, cloaked in shame. This leads to increased frustration, feelings of isolation, and a terrible understanding of intimacy. According to a 2014 study in the Journal of Early Adolescence, many teens watch porn out of curiosity and a lack of understanding about sexuality. There's plenty of research to show how watching porn can be disruptive to 'normal' activities like sports, even socialising, and worse, it can desensitise boys, who may seek more aggressive pornographic images.

Wouldn't it be better to take the reins and hold healthy conversations about puberty with your older kids so they feel less alone and less insecure about fitting in? The Blume documentary offers some insight into how those conversations can be held in her usual candour style point, Blume was getting of storytelling. -- Courtesy 2,000 letters a month. She Dawn that time, the Cold War with the Soviet Union had just ended, and the world had moved into the phase of globalisation and interdependence. It seemed then that the Western governance model of liberal democracy and market economies had prevailed. The Washington Consensus proposed a policy prescription of 'deregulation, privatisation, and free trade' as a recipe for the economic modernisation of a globalised order. Nearly three decades later, the US is questioning the assumptions underlying the Washington Consensus. Speaking at the Brookings Institution last month, US National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan explained how no assumption had delivered the desired results for the US, and had, instead, benefited China. Sullivan argued that the first assumption: 'markets know best' undermined the US industrial base as manufacturing and supply chains of strategic goods moved overseas to China along with jobs.

The second assumption, 'all growth was good growth', distracted the US from critical areas of economy such as infrastructure and semiconductors. The third assumption, 'economic integration would make nations more responsible', had also not worked well because China, according to Sullivan, was using its economic wealth to nurture its military ambitions.

The US now wants to replace the Washington

of which were identified by Sullivan: the US would rebuild its industrial base, especially for semiconductors and green technologies; work with 'likeminded' partners to build a cutting-edge techno-industrial base; remodel trade policies to develop diversified supply chains (to reduce reliance on China-centred supply chains); and transition towards clean energy and a digital economy. It also wants to create an alternative to China's Belt and Road Initiative mobilising investments in emerging economies. Clearly, alongside the wants to re-establish its primacy in global trade and finance. And yet, indications are that the US is not seeking to 'decouple' its economy from that of China, but only 'de-risking' it to the extent that its national security does not face challenges from China's dominance of the world economy. Speaking at the Johns Hopkins University last month, US Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen confirmed that US President Joe Biden believes that China and the US can manage their economic ties "responsibly". China is disturbed about America's protectionist measures against Chinese firms and its attempts to replace the prevailing international economic order with its hegemonic rules. However, Beijing's reaction has been moderate as it wants to continue its peaceful rise to achieve the centenary goal of making China a fully developed society by 2049. It would be important for the minders of Pakistan's economy to closely watch the evolving global economic architecture.
