Undoing the past

The PDM coalition government seems to be preparing for the next general elections with some lastminute measures to 'level the playing field', so to speak. It has recently introduced legislation that will allow politicians handed a lifetime disqualification from holding public office to return to the political arena, and also to 'restore' to the ECP the sole power to announce and amend election schedules.

The latter seems to be a bid to preclude any legal challenges that may arise over any further tinkering with election timelines. The proposed amendment will allow the ECP to unilaterally decide when elections are to be held once they become due.

While this may have passed much scrutiny in simpler times the present context has complicated matters: the move seems aimed at providing legal cover to the ECP for its failure to hold elections to various assemblies within constitutionally stipulated timeframes

The other proposal, to limit disqualifications under Article 62(1)(f) to five years instead of a lifetime, is likely to draw even more controversy because critics will invariably see it as 'person-specific'. In particular, it will directly benefit PML-N leader Nawaz Sharif and the newly minted Istehkami-Pakistan Party's patron, Jahangir Tareen.

But, as the government has generously pointed out, the rule change will also apply to PTI chairman Imran Khan, who is the latest to have the disqualification sword hanging over his head. While the timing of this legislation is indeed unpropitious, the historical context must be considered.

The Supreme Court had been roundly criticised for ruling, in 2018, that an Article 62(1)(f) disqualification is for life. The article sets a rather nebulous standard for lawmakers, and the apex court's strict interpretation of it was widely seen as just a means to keep a thrice-elected prime minister out of the running from any future political contest on the basis of a rather weak conviction in the Panama Pa-

That said, the manner in which the Supreme Court's earlier decision is being undone is problematic. Laws that are passed without following the legislative process — ie, after robust debate and due consideration by both the government and opposition benches — remain vulnerable to future challenges and, therefore, lack durability. Parliament should be seen to be representative of the people, not just a party or group of parties, nor any individual.

Had these two proposals been discussed and debated with opposition parties, had the government helped their critics understand how its proposed legislation would benefit the political process, and had the government been transparent about the drafting of the laws, perhaps the objections raised would not have arisen. Parliament cannot be used only as a rubber stamp — it must be thought it also aptly meaningfully invested in all legislation that passes through its two Houses.

On a few people's recommendations I watched the Netflix show Scoop about an Indian journalist Jagruti Pathak's quest for front page stories and how, in that chase, she gets embroiled in the murder of another journalist. The person reporting stories suddenly becomes the story. It's a fascinating show that sheds light on the connections between the media, law enforcement and criminal gangs. And it's based on Jigna Vora's memoir Behind Bars in Byculla, about her time in prison, charged for the murder of journalist Jyotirmoy Dey

Scoop is not just about Pathak's incarceration and her fight to clear her name. It tells the story of a female crime reporter navigating a very male-dominated space in which she must deal with their aspersions on her character and ethical practices. Pathak has worked hard to rise to reach her position and enjoys the full support of her editor. She deals with jealous colleagues and police officers playing politics in a bid to broker their own

Civil service reform

Aizaz Ahmad

Chaudhry In the heart of Vienna lies a flourishing Pakistani restaurant that caters to thousands of tourists and locals. The owner has credited much of the restaurant's success to an enabling business environment. For instance, while his restaurant is regularly and rigorously inspected by government officials, there is no expectation of or demand for bribes. One wonders what motivates Austrian government functionaries to do their job effectively and honestly. Is there a lesson we could learn from international best practices? An Institutional Reforms Cell (2018-2021) with Dr Ishrat Husain at its helm examined this question. It noted that, besides law and order, the essential role of any government is to create an enabling environment for commerce and industry. This requires an efficient civil service, physical infrastructure and rule of law. The IRC observed that in Pakistan's case, the government is "weak and expansive", cumbersome, centralised and inefficient.

Greater devolution of power, authority and resources to grassroots levels of government also contributes to the provision of efficient public service delivery, provided there is, inter alia, a competent bureaucracy. China's stellar economic performance, for instance, is attributed to a 'meritocratic bureaucracy' and focused leadership. In our case, the IRC noted that civil servants were 'badly motivated" and "unresponsive" to public needs. It formulated pro-were only partly implemented. Several other attempts to reform the civil services have suffered a similar fate. Committees and task forces are formed, reports are finalised, but not implemented.

The last major civil service reform took place in 1973 when Zulfikar Ali categorisation of civil servants from Class I, II, III and IV to a new structure based on pay grades 1-22. The 1973 reforms sought to end the elite culture and false sense of superiority that civil servants seemed to have assumed. Elitist titles like the Civil Service of Pakistan were abolished, and instead, a Common Training Programme for 13 occupational groups was introduced.

But these reforms had a downside. They withdrew constitutional guarantee for service security, leading to frequent transfers of civil servants on political grounds and undermining rule-based continuity. Salaries were time, the best and brightest started avoiding the civil service, and "mediocre and pliable" civil servants began to run government offices and institutions. Politicisation and mediocrity have severely impaired government's capacity to create a congenial business environment or render efficient public service delivery. Gen Musharraf's

National Reconstruction Bureau tinkered with some aspects of the civil service, ostensibly to 'reconstruct' local governments, but many of the measures became controversial and were later re-'whole value chain" of human resource policies. The IRC rightly observed that recruitment methods their utility; specialisation posals for reform, which and technical expertise were marginalised, and performance had no link with remuneration. Internal accountability mechanisms had become weak.

To address this, the IRC proposed an 'All-Pakistan National Executive Service' for senior management positions, and the introduction of four specialised cadres under Bhutto changed the it for economic management, technical, social sector management, and general management. Another sound proposal was to reduce the hierarchy of each ministry and department from five to three deputy secretary, joint secretary, secretary — in order to infuse efficiency.

Central to civil service reforms is the system of recruitment of candidates for the central superior services by the Federal Public Service Commission (FPSC). The process of recruitment is long and tedious and benefits rote learners more than critical thinkers. In the CSS results for 2022, out of the 20,262 governance and policy candidates who appeared in the written examinaalso compressed. Over tion, only 393 passed. time, the best and brightsider open, transparent, technology-based methods, which are now being applied across the world, to recruit civil servants who are critical thinkers, tech-savvy and can relate to the growing needs of the people. Alternatively, the system of centralised recruitment through FPSC should be done away with, leaving recruitment, performance evaluation and promotion to each service to encourage specialisation and efficiency. An honest, competent and efficient bureaucracy is the 'steel structure' that can help Pakistan secure a versed. Clearly, a reform stable and prosperous fupackage should cover the ture. Implementing civil service reforms should be a high priority if we want economic security and rule-based governance and intake had outlived for our people. -- Courtesv Dawn

Blinken starts rare Philippine China trip with hopes low for any breakthrough

Monitoring Desk BEIJING: US Secretary of

State Antony Blinken began meetings in Beijing on Sunday, the first top American diplomat to visit China in five years, amid frosty bilateral ties and dim prospects for any breakthrough on the long list of disputes between the world's two largest economies.

Having postponed a February trip after a suspected Chinese spy balloon flew over US airspace, Blinken is the highest-ranking US government official to visit China since President Joe Biden took office in January 2021.

Chinese Foreign Minister Qin Gang greeted Blinken and his group at the door to a villa in the grounds of Beijing's Diaoyutai State Guest House, as the two made small talk in English before shaking hands in front a Chinese and an American flag.

After heading into a meeting room, neither Blinken nor Qin made comments in front of reporters who were briefly

Europeans scramble on air defence after decades of complacency

Monitoring Desk

PARIS: The intensity of the drone and missile war in Ukraine has laid bare gaps in European states' air defences that experts say will be difficult, time-consuming and costly to plug. Anti-air systems will likely have a starring role at the Paris Air Show starting on Monday, predicts Richard Aboulafia, managdirector AeroDynamic Advisory.

"You're going to see a lot of talk about production capacity for missiles. The market for missiles is easily the fastest growing segment of the industry and yet the manufacturers simply can't keep up,' Aboulafia told AFP.

Western countries had enjoyed total mastery of the skies since the end of the Cold War and largely dropped the powerful defences once designed to protect NATO forces from . Soviet aircraft.

France got rid of eight of its nine anti-aircraft artillery regiments, MPs flagged up in a recent re-

But NATO countries fence again in recent years as more states have acquired cruise missiles, short-range ballistic missiles and drones, said Mark Cancian, a retired US marine colonel who is a senior adviser at the USbased Center for Strategic and International Studies

"They started it, but basically didn't get too far," Cancian told AFP. "In another five years, I think there'll be a lot more out there, but that doesn't help Ukraine right now," he added.

With anti-air systems and the missiles they fire lacking, the West is struggling to respond to Ukraine's pleas for supply whether for short- or long-range defences.

Berlin plans to spend five billion euros on antiair from a 100-billion-euro ($110 billion) fund for rebuilding its armed forces in the coming years, with the same amount budgeted in Paris for the period to 2030.
