Rangers called Mob vandalises several churches, homes in Jaranwala over blasphemy allegations

Caretaker PM vows strict action against culprits

Monitoring Desk
LAHORE: Multiple churches were attacked on Wednesday in Jaranwala tehsil of Faisalabad over blasphemy allegations. Media reports stated that a mob of over 100 people stormed a local Christian neighbourhood in Jaranwala and set ablaze at least one church, the Salvation Army Church, one of the oldest in the area. The United Presbyterian Church, Allied Foundation Church and Shehroonwala Church situated in Isa Nagri were also reportedly ransacked. Locals accused the police of standing by as spectators as hundreds of people, armed with sticks and batons, vandalised the churches besides ransacking and even burning homes in the residential area. As panic spread in the area, traders shut down shops and a strike was called. The situation remained tense despite policemen led by the Jaranwala SP being present on site. The mob also blocked the area surrounding Cinema Chowk. The police attempted to give assurances of action against the blasphemy accused but the mob remained adamant that they would hang the accused themselves. The mob was reportedly incited using loudspeakers of mosques in the area over reports of alleged desecration of religious scriptures by three Christians, suggested videos and messages posted on social media by people of the area.

Caretaker Prime Minister Anwaar-ul-Haq Kakar on Wednesday directed law enforcement agencies to apprehend culprits behind the vandalism of churches in Jaranwala, Faisalabad over blasphemy allegations. "I am gutted by the visuals coming out of Jaranwala, Faisalabad. Stern action would be taken against those who violate law and target minorities," said Kakar in a post on X, the microblogging website formerly known as Twitter.

He said that the population of Balochistan had been shown as 2 crore 14 lakh, the meeting of Council of Common Interests (CCI) waited for Chief Minister for six hours. was made justification of delay in the general elections. The BNP chief stated so while speaking to a private TV channel on Wednesday. ## On a tightrope

With the country now in election mode, all eyes will be on the Election Commission of Pakistan, which must ensure that the upcoming polls are held fairly and on time.

The watchdog will be walking a tightrope due to the last-minute notification of fresh census results by the former PDM government, which has necessitated the fresh delimitation of constituencies.

The prevalent belief is that the ECP will not be able to complete the delimitation while meeting the election time frame stipulated in the Constitution. At the same time, recent developments have restricted the space for any legal manoeuvring.

It may be recalled that a three-member bench of the apex court had, earlier this month, issued a detailed judgement castigating the ECP's decision to postpone elections for the Punjab and KP assemblies as 'unconstitutional'. The judgement in question had severely rebuked the ECP for "failing to appreciate its constitutional authority" over its failure to hold elections on time.

A week later, the court also struck down a law that would have allowed the ECP to seek a review of that judgement. Yesterday, the court weighed in on the delimitation of constituencies as a two-member bench heard a 2018 petition on the same matter. Observing that the ECP must conduct the exercise in a transparent manner, the chief justice, who was part of the bench, described the issue as "a matter of public interest", which has been brought to the Supreme Court multiple times.

With the legal noose tightening around the ECP's neck, it must also contend with the complications of the task before it. According to an analysis published in these pages, the delimitation exercise will likely end up affecting dozens of districts at the provincial level.

As there is no National Assembly to simply increase the number of seats in the provincial assemblies to reflect changes in the population, the ECP may have to redistribute existing seats between different districts within provinces. It may also have to create new constituencies such that parts of one district may share a constituency with parts of another.

Either of these could trigger a political uproar and lead to multiple new legal challenges, which would imperil the timely completion of the entire exercise. Amidst all this, the ECP must also undertake the delicate task of drawing up new constituencies.

Gerrymandering, which is the manipulation of constituency boundaries to alter their political makeup and thereby 'control' election results, will remain a particularly important concern, especially considering that other forms of pre-election engineering are also very much in play.

The ECP must, therefore, take all stakeholders along and ensure complete transparency in its work. With the law breathing down its neck, it cannot let external factors delay the election exercise.

Zahid Hussain

The long suspense over the appointment of the interim prime minister finally ended with the nomination of a dark horse. The choice took even members of the ruling coalition by surprise. The name of Senator Anwaar-ul-Haq Kakar for the top post is said to have been proposed by the outgoing leader of the opposition and agreed to by the former prime minister.

But the matter is not as simple as we are made to believe. The way the name of the senator from Balochistan popped up from nowhere leaves nothing to the imagination. Given Kakar's political affiliation and patronage, it is not hard to guess whose choice he is. The elevation of a protégé to the helm signals the country's transition from hybrid rule to a virtual praetorian takeover with a civilian façade.

There is not even a pretence of neutrality with the launch of 'Project Kakar'. It also raises questions about elections being held on time. Even if they are held, the fairness of the polls will remain in doubt under a pliant interim arrangement. The lengthening shadow of the security establishment renders prospects of a democratic transition uncertain. There is an element of truth to BNP leader Akhtar Mengal's criticism, in response to Kakar's nomination, that politicians turn to the establishment even for those challenges they should resolve politically.

My first introduction to Kakar came during a seminar on Balochistan in Quetta in early 2017. He was one of the organisers of the conference. What drew my attention was the comments he made on my talk at one of the sessions. He vehemently disputed my assertion on missing persons. "Why do you only talk about missing persons?" he asked, in front of the military top brass sitting in the front row.

This apparent defence of the security agencies may not have been without purpose; he was soon appointed spokesman for the then chief minister. Meanwhile, he had also set up an NGO called Voice of Balochistan.

He entered the political limelight following his key role in the formation of the Balochistan Awami Party in 2018. The role of the security establishment in the creation of the king's party is not a secret. The same year, he became a senator. His political ascent in such a short period was quite remarkable. He projected the establishment's point of view on national and international policy issues from public forums and channels. Nonetheless, his affability and articulation won him many friends among Islamabad's political circles. This may have been an added factor in his nomination.

But the entire episode of selection of interim prime minister manifests the feebleness of our political leadership that abdicated its remit so meekly. The series of legislation enacted by the ruling coalition has not only empowered the caretaker government whose constitutional responsibility was limited to supervising elections, but also provided sweeping powers to the security agencies strengthening the establishment's stranglehold.

In fact, in the last 16 months we have experienced a hybrid-plus rule. The inclusion of the army leadership in a supra body spearheading the country's economic and investment policies has enhanced the military's political role and put the security establishment in the driving seat.

Instead of selecting a non-partisan person to head the interim administration with the consensus of political parties, it seems that the former government has accepted the nominee of a security institution. The former ruling alliance has helped create a situation that will soon come back to haunt it.

Akhtar Mengal in a letter to the PML-N chief cautioned that "Legislation contrary to human rights will probably be used against you in the future, [we know] because we, the residents of Balochistan, have not been considered human beings since day one." But his warning went unheeded by the PDM leadership.

Surprisingly, the PTI also tacitly approved Kakar's nomination, perhaps assuming that it would isolate the PDM, while not realising that the security establishment's expanding power would not help ease pressure on the party. Such politics of expediency and shortsightedness are nothing new in our political culture. Interestingly, with only a few voices of protest from some Baloch political leaders, there has not been any serious objection to the selection of an establishment nominee for the critical job. The argument that Kakar's appointment may help ease Baloch alienation hardly holds water given the scepticism expressed by some Baloch leaders. There are many Baloch leaders with much stronger credentials who could have been chosen for the job.

Now with an interim arrangement in place, the main challenge is not to allow the electoral process to be delayed under any pretext. True, there is already some debate that elections cannot be held before February next year because of the delimitation of constituencies required under the new population census. That may be a genuine reason for a delay of a few months. But going beyond that will have huge consequences for the country's stability. It is not only important to hold elections within a stipulated time frame but also to ensure a democratic transition through fair polls. Given the prevailing political tension and polarisation, the challenges before the Election Commission of Pakistan are enormous. It is also imperative for the caretakers to bring down the political temperature in the country. The persecution of PTI supporters must be stopped and those arrested without charge released to create a conducive atmosphere for the elections. A country facing existential threats cannot afford to go through experiments that lead to the derailment of the democratic process. -- Courtesy Dawn

Pakistan's new roadmap

Atta-ur-Rahman

Pakistan's current economic collapse is largely due to our leaders not recognizing that socio-economic development no longer depends on natural resources but largely on the ability of our human resources to create new innovations that lead to the manufacture and export of high technology value-added products. That is the reason why Pakistan has drowned itself in debt, and we must borrow more money at even higher interest rates to pay off old debts. So, the hole that we have dug ourselves into gets deeper and deeper.

The whole of the education sector needs to be completely revamped if we are to become internationally competitive. This can be done relatively easily now by integration of Massive Open Online Courses (MOOCs) at school, college and university levels that are freely available from Khan Academy, MIT Open Courseware, Coursera, Udacity and many other sources. About 10 years ago we created an integrated version of MOOCs which are freely available at www.lej4learning.com.pk and which contain some 73,000 video lectures at school, college, and university levels. These need to be integrated into our educational systems so that our students can benefit from excellent faculty available from all over the world. Several thousand Khan Academy lectures have been translated into Urdu and are also available at this website.

The new government must have a visionary scientist or engineer as the minister of planning and development to quickly launch Pakistan on the road to a strong knowledge economy. Unless this new vision is impregnated into the entire government system at all levels, and our development focus changes from the conventional development approach and becomes tailored to the demands posed by the new and disruptive innovations that are changing world economies, we will remain a poor country deeply sunk in international debt. Here is a glimpse of the new world that we live in and the new economic opportunities that exist.

The rapid pace of technological advancement has led to a plethora of disruptive innovations in various fields. They have revolutionized various industries, reshaping the way we live, work, and interact with the world around us. For instance, biotechnology has witnessed a groundbreaking innovation in the form of CRISPR-Cas9 gene editing. This revolutionary technique allows scientists to precisely edit DNA, enabling them to modify, delete, or insert genes with unprecedented accuracy. CRISPR-Cas9 has the potential to treat genetic diseases such as sickle cell anemia, enhance crop resilience against pests and environmental stress, and create genetically modified organisms tailored to specific needs.

Regenerative medicine has seen remarkable advancements through 3D bioprinting, a technique that enables the creation of functional, personalized tissues and organs. By layering bioinks composed of living cells, scientists can fabricate intricate structures with the potential to replace damaged organs or accelerate wound healing. This innovation offers hope for addressing organ shortages and improving patient outcomes, paving the way for a new era of healthcare. In 2020, scientists at Tel Aviv University successfully 3D bioprinted a heart using human tissue and vessels, showcasing the potential of bioprinting for creating complex, functional organs.

Precision farming, empowered by technologies like GPS, sensors, and data analytics, has transformed traditional agriculture into a highly efficient and data-driven practice. Farmers can now monitor and manage their crops with precision, optimizing irrigation, fertilization, and pest control based on real-time data. Precision agriculture has resulted in increased yields, reduced resource wastage, and promotion of sustainable farming practices, thereby addressing the challenges posed by a growing global population and changing climate.

Another rapidly emerging field is that of Collaborative Robots (Cobots). Cobots have revolutionized industries by working alongside humans, enhancing productivity and safety. Unlike traditional robots that operate in isolation, cobots can be programmed to perform intricate tasks while interacting with their human counterparts. In manufacturing, cobots have streamlined assembly lines, while in healthcare, they assist in surgery and patient care, thereby minimizing human error and fatigue.

Similarly, Deep Learning, a subset of artificial intelligence, has ushered in a new era of machine learning capabilities. Through neural networks with multiple layers, deep learning models have achieved remarkable feats, such as image and speech recognition, natural language processing, and autonomous vehicles. The transformative impact of deep learning is evident in personalized recommendations from platforms like Netflix, medical diagnoses through advanced image analysis, and predictive analytics for financial markets.

The transportation industry has undergone a paradigm shift with the rise of electric and autonomous vehicles. Electric vehicles (EVs) are reducing greenhouse gas emissions and dependence on fossil fuels, while autonomous vehicles have the potential to enhance road safety and redefine mobility. These innovations are reshaping urban planning, public transportation, and logistics, with implications for energy consumption, air quality, and urban design.

The disruptive innovations discussed above underscore the transformative power of human ingenuity and technological advancement. This can only happen in Pakistan if we have a government in which all ministers and secretaries are top experts with PhD degrees from leading universities in relevant disciplines and the minister of planning is a visionary technocrat who understands the importance of a knowledge economy for socio-economic development and for national defense. -- Courtesy TheNews

Alexander Road

Danyal Adam Khan

Every day in Islamabad for the past few months has been a battle between the city and its administrators. One may argue that the two have never gotten along, but the breakneck speed at which the new administration is inflicting its efficiency on the city is dizzying. Just last month, the Capital Development Authority (CDA) announced an open auction for 20 one-kilometre plots to build a food street inside Shakarparian National Park on the "pattern of JBR Dubai".

Now the latest victim of this developmental rampage is none other than the Margalla Hills National Park (MHNP) — that serene backdrop of Islamabad based on which we lay a vague claim to being the second most beautiful capital in the world — and the weapon of choice is called Alexander Road. For context, this is a 7.5-kilometre road to be constructed through the Margalla Hills to connect Islamabad with Haripur at a cost of Rs600 million. The inauguration was done by none other than former prime minister Shehbaz Sharif at the opening ceremony of the equally contentious Margalla Avenue.

Building a road through this national park is not a new idea. There was the catastrophic tunnel project 10 years ago which envisioned digging a passage way straight through the hills onto the other side, and was brought to a stop with a Supreme Court suo motu.

This is also not the first time 'development' has been thrust upon these protected zones. There's the Navy Sailing Club on Rawal Dam, as well as the Margalla Greens Golf Club in E-8 — both declared illegal by the Islamabad High Court. There are also, of course, the glittering encroachments of Monal and accompanying restaurants, along with residential areas spilling into every part of the range.

Making matters considerably worse is the fact that a formal boundary demarcation of the MHNP is still pending — despite the Islamabad High Court ordering the CDA to do so last year. This boundary, which somehow simultaneously exists on all maps and yet seems obfuscated, has opened up several questions about whether land allocated in the Margalla foothills for golf courses and cricket grounds belongs to MHNP or not. Similar confusion abounds in terms of jurisdiction, for example, when the CDA chairman took to Twitter and contemplated the construction of a road from Bari Imam to Pir Sohawa, and the climate change minister had to step in and inform him that building roads through national parks was not within the CDA's domain.

The construction of Alexander Road, in the meantime, has been halted by the Senate Standing Committee on Climate Change. In the words of the chairperson of Islamabad Wildlife Management Board, the project is aimed at "benefiting real estate" and not local communities — and herein lies the heart of the matter: the CDA's commitment towards real estate development and land value appreciation. With the construction of Alexander Road still up in the air, lucrative housing societies have already been advertised at the Haripur end.

That notwithstanding, perhaps the most audacious aspect of this new scheme is that it was launched without so much as an environmental impact assessment. A CDA official has been quoted as saying that since a basic thoroughfare already exists here for local use, merely upgrading it into a proper road does not require an EIA. To reiterate: the CDA does not believe it requires an environmental impact assessment to build a metalled road through a national park. With im-plementing state institutions going rogue in this manner, legislation like the Islam-abad Nature Conservation and Wildlife Management Act, and the National Adaptation Plan will be rendered useless.

This is not the kind of frivolity we can afford with our climate realities. We can lull ourselves into complacency by repeating statistics about Pakistan's low carbon emissions. While these might be accurate for the country as a whole, it is also true that our cities are among the most polluted in the world. Even if we launch frantic tree-planting campaigns in all our cities, it will not be enough to counter the damage done by our crippling automobile dependence. This is not to say that it should not be done, just that plantation drives must go hand in hand with reduced concretisation and cars to have any real impact.

But where are we heading when our administrators decide to do neither? As invasive as its namesake, Alexander Road represents the worst of both worlds: the desecration of a national park in exchange for more asphalt and concrete, more plots and profits. -- Courtesy Dawn

Scorched earth

Mahir Ali

More than 60 years ago, a British sci-fi movie called The Day the Earth Caught Fire illuminated the catastrophic consequences of anthropogenic climate change.

Fossil fuels were not part of the script; some oil company executives already knew about the possible fallout, but it wasn't public knowledge. The filmmakers focused instead on a crucial contemporary concern. The US and the USSR simultaneously conducted atmospheric nuclear tests that shift Earth's axis by 11 degrees. As a result, the planet hurtles towards the sun and terrestrial temperatures head beyond 60 degrees Celsius amid cyclones, hurricanes, typhoons and torrential rainfall.

I haven't watched the film and am relying here on a feature published by the BBC this week, which says the scriptwriters were aware that the science behind their conceit was dubious — unlike the scientific theories that help explain the flames consuming terrain from Rhodes in Greece to Maui in Hawaii.

The threat of nuclear warfare has lately resurfaced in the context of the tussle over Ukraine ignited by Vladimir Putin and fuelled by Nato. Its consequences have been devastating for large numbers of Ukrainians — and to a lesser extent for Russians. Aside from the geopolitics of the conflict, the most obvious global repercussions revolve around the energy sector.

Europe's newfound

distaste for Russian gas has led to China and India becoming the biggest beneficiaries of cut-price fossil fuels from the north. For the most part, though, the West hasn't doubled down on renewables as an energy source, but, instead, afforded its biggest polluters the opportunity to step up their operations.

In Australia, for instance, it's not uncommon to come across the idiotic argument that digging for more gas is tantamount to aiding the struggle for democratic self-determination in Ukraine. Never mind that the International Energy Agency warned against further fossil fuel exploration years ago. The warning just last month from UN Secretary General António Guterres that "the era of global boiling has arrived" goes unheeded — much like most things the UN says.

Greenwashing aside, the multinational oil and gas firms will not change their business model until it ceases to be profitable. Right now, profits are spiking, and their biggest concern is the possibility of extra taxes rather than the state of the world. That's how capitalism works. That's why a million dollars a week is considered low-grade pay for CEOs who fight tooth and nail against a minimum wage of $15 for their employees.

It could be argued with some justification that concerns about energy and the imperative to maintain sustainable 'First World' lifestyles are the driving force behind recent decisions by the British, Australian and US governments to speed up or facilitate further fossil fuel misadventures. And right-wing think tanks in America are already drawing up agendas to thwart climate action in the event of a second Trump presidency, which is possible notwithstanding the four indictments against the ex-president.

China and India are often cited as leading culprits in intensifying coal-powered energy. Their excuse is that the nations that were able to industrialise based on relatively easy access to coal, oil and gas are ethically in no position to lecture the stragglers.

That's a valid debating point, but its value is diminished by global exigencies — including the recent floods in Beijing and the current rains in Himachal Pradesh. To their credit, both China and India have also been making advances in green energy. But their continued reliance on coal suggests it's not enough. The leading responsibility for fossil fuel proliferation lies with the primary predators — both nation states and Western energy firms — but everyone needs to chip in.

July was the hottest month on Earth not only in recorded history but in scientific extrapolations reaching back thousands of years. And it is almost guaranteed that there will be worse to follow. Tragically, the reality of apocalypse now is rejected not just by the fossil fuel profiteers but also by plenty of people fooled into dismissing the science behind climate change as part of some kind of a 'woke' agenda or Marxist plot, notwithstanding the evidence unfolding before our eyes.

The feature film mentioned at the outset also reflects the efforts of political leaders to brush off the impending doomsday. In the end, they opt for a series of joint nuclear explosions in western Siberia in an attempt to swing the planet back into its original axis. Audiences never learn the outcome. They just get to see two newspaper front pages prepared by the film's protagonists. One headline says 'World Saved', the other proclaims 'World Doomed'. -- Courtesy Dawn

Samina Alvi for creating awareness to ensure special person's rights

MUZAFFARABAD (APP): First Lady Begum Samina Alvi on Wednesday urged the relevant officials, authorities, media, civil society, health institutions and welfare organizations to organize awareness campaigns to ensure basic rights of the persons with disabilities.

She also called upon the government institutions to increase facilities to address the social and health issues being faced by the special persons, besides improving the primary healthcare system.

"I also appeal to people from all walks of life to work collectively for safeguarding the rights of differently-abled persons and their welfare, and ensuring a healthier, comprehensive and equality-based society," the first lady said in a message.

She said the persons with disabilities, who accounted for around 10 to 12% of the country's population, were facing difficulties to live a normal life and move around easily.

However, now people were more aware about their problems and that was because of the campaign conducted through seminars, conferences, walks and ceremonies, and messages sent to millions of mobile phone consumers, she added.

Similarly, she said, the welfare organizations and hospitals had also extended facilities to them.

She appreciated the role of electronic media, newspapers, social media, NGOs and civil society that supported their efforts in creating public awareness about the health issues.

She regretted that the persons with disabilities were facing multiple barriers in their access to health, education and employment opportunities.

"We have to make them financially empowered by providing skilled-based education and health facilities," she added.

Samina Alvi said an ignored segment of society were the people suffering from psychological issues, who hesitated to talk about their problems or go to a psychiatrist for treatment because of 'social stigma'.

Around 24% of the country's population was suffering from various psychological issues, she added.

The first lady also asked the women to spare five minutes every month for self-examination for early detection of breast cancer. A number of women died in Pakistan every year due to breast cancer, she added.

France to provide $3.27m for rehabilitation in flood-hit areas of Sindh

ISLAMABAD (APP): The Government of France has allocated 3 million euros (nearly 3.27 million USD) to support UNICEF's humanitarian response in flood-affected areas. This vital funding will strengthen primary healthcare and immunization services in the most affected districts in Sindh province, targeting 1.9 million children and women.

This contribution from France follows the International Conference on Climate Resilient Pakistan, co-hosted by the United Nations and the Government of Pakistan in Geneva, earlier this year.

The conference garnered international support for flood recovery and rehabilitation, as well as long-term partnerships to build Pakistan's climate resilience and adaptation.

"Children are often the first victims of crises and natural disasters, but also those who bear invisible scars for the longest time. France is pleased to partner with UNICEF to expand access to primary health care and improve immunization services for the most vulnerable communities in Sindh," stated Nicolas Galey, Ambassador of France to Pakistan.

Sindh province was particularly hard hit by last year's floods. Approximately 14.5 million people were affected and almost 1,000 health facilities were damaged or destroyed. Communities and health workers were displaced, while medical supplies and services were damaged and disrupted.

Over the past year, UNICEF has reached 3.6 million people with primary healthcare services in flood affected areas, but for many communities, adequate healthcare remains out of reach.

"The onset of the monsoon exacerbates the health risks for children and women in flood-affected areas. The spread of diseases, such as malaria, dengue and Acute Watery Diarrhoea are a particular concern. This generous and important funding from France enables UNICEF to expand critical healthcare and strengthen immunization services during a time of great need," said Abdullah Fadil, UNICEF Representative in Pakistan.

The devastating floods in 2022 affected nearly 33 million people, including 16 million children, and was widely recognized as a climate-induced disaster.

PTI urges caretaker PM to ensure timely elections

ISLAMABAD (INP): A day after the Election Commission of Pakistan (ECP) failed to give the Supreme Court a final date for the upcoming general elections, Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) Vice Chairman Shah Mahmood Qureshi urged caretaker Prime Minister Anwaar-ul-Haq Kakar to ensure timely polls in the country.

Speculations about the delay in holding polls sparked when Director General (Law) Muhammad Arshad failed to give the apex court a certain date for the polls. Hearing petitions against delimitations of provincial constituencies PS 7, 8, and 9 Shikarpur, Chief Justice of Pakistan (CJP) Umar Ata Bandial on Tuesday inquired when were the general elections being held. To this, the director general shrugged his shoulders.

"As yet, no date for the elections has been decided. The election commission should resolve all issues before the polls," the CJP remarked.

In a letter to the interim prime minister, Qureshi apprised Kakar that his party intended to challenge the decision made by the Council of Common Interests (CCI) in the court.

On August 5, the CCI "unanimously" approved the 7th Population and Housing Census results, making it almost certain that the general elections — which were to be held in November after the dissolution of the National Assembly on August 9 — would not be held during the current year.

"Time has come to put the country on the path of law and the constitution," he added.
