President directs completion of Kachhi Canal project within 18 months

ISLAMABAD (APP): President Asif Ali Zardari on Monday directed the authorities concerned to ensure completion of the Kachhi Canal project within 1.5 years to irrigate around 713,000 acres of land in Balochistan province. The president, while chairing a meeting on the Green Pakistan Initiative (GPI), at Aiwan-e-Sadr, said that the federal government would provide funding for the project to ensure its timely completion on a priority basis, a President House press release said. In the meeting, the president was briefed about the construction of six strategic canals for the Green Pakistan Initiative. Minister for Interior, Syed Mohsin Raza Naqvi, and senior military officials attended the meeting. President Zardari was informed that the construction of six strategic canals, viz. Chashma Right Bank Canal, Kachhi Canal, Ramee Canal, Greater Thal Canal, Cholistan Canal, and Thar Canal, would help enhance the agricultural potential of Pakistan by increasing the cultivable area as well as the livestock and fisheries potential of the country. He directed to kickstart work on strategic canals for GPI and ensure their early completion, besides lining them with concrete to prevent seepage and wastage of water. He urged the need to develop Pakistan's irrigation sector along modern lines to conserve water, reduce water losses, and enhance water availability.

Balochistan cabinet approves to populate government owned land under Green Corporation Partnership Project

Independent Report QUETTA: The Balochistan cabinet has approved settlement of the government owned land under the Green Corporation Partnership Project in the province. The cabinet also imposed ban on new recruitments in all public sector universities of the province. In this regard, the Chief Minister expressed concern over the rapid recruitments and construction of new buildings in the public sector universities saying that at the time where the universities are not having enough money to pay salaries to their employees, abrupt recruitments are being made and new buildings are being built there. The provincial cabinet took the above decisions in its fourth meeting held with the Chief Minister, Mir Sarfraz Ahmed Bugti in the chair on Monday morning. The provincial ministers, advisors and senior high ups of the provincial governments were in attendance at the meeting. The cabinet also constituted a special committee for review of the Public Sector Universities Act and making its comparison with other provinces. The committee would be comprised: Provincial Minister for Finance, Mir Shoaib Nausherwani, Provincial Minister for Planning and Development, Mir Zahoor Ahmed Buledi, Provincial Minister Livestock, Bakht Muhammad Kakar and Secretary Higher Education. It was decided in the meeting that the committee would prepare its recommendations within a week. Addressing the cabinet, the Chief Minister said that the provincial government is working with diligence for establishing good governance and improving service delivery system in the province.

28,000 tube wells in Balochistan to be converted on solar power: PM

Says federal govt to provide 70%, Balochistan to contribute 30% in Rs55 bln solarization project

QUETTA (APP): Prime Minister Muhammad Shehbaz Sharif on Monday said that under an agreement reached between the Federal and Balochistan provincial governments, a total of 28,000 agricultural tube wells in the province would be shifted to solar system within three months.

Talking to media after the agreement signing ceremony, the prime minister said the federal government would provide 70 percent funds while 30 percent would be contributed by the provincial government for Rs 55 billion solarization project. The prime minister met the provincial cabinet in which the federal ministers and Governor Balochistan Jafar Khan Mandokhel and Chief Minister Sarfraz Ahmed Bugti were present, PM Office Media Wing said in a press release. Earlier, the prime minister witnessed an agreement signing ceremony between the federal and the provincial governments for shifting of electricity run tube wells to solar powered mechanism.

The prime minister tasked the chief minister to complete the solarization project within three months. He opined that the completion of project would ensure prosperity of the farmers and bring a large area of cultivable land under farming, adding that with functioning of the solar powered tube wells, the farmers would get uninterrupted power supply throughout the day. During his address to the provincial cabinet, he termed the agreement as 'a deep structured change' firmly rooted in the government's conceived reforms agenda, he said that a huge sum of Rs500 billion would be saved from going down the drain.

The prime minister said that the federal government would be absolve of paying Rs80-90 billion burden which was provided as subsidy to the province due to non-payment of bills and still the farmers community was getting 2 to 6 hours power supply. With the solarization process, the issue would be resolved forever, he expressed the hope.

The prime minister said that throughout the world, the utilization of solar capacity was tapped for generation of environment friendly power which was considered as the inexpensive source of power.

Place where Quaid-e-Azam had spent last days set ablaze: Apex Court

ISLAMABAD (Online): Supreme Court (SC) has adjourned till July 11 hearing of case against trial of civilians in military courts. The order said the plea of Lahore High Court (LHC) Bar for becoming respondent is accepted. Faisal Siddiqui told the court he does not want to pursue the petition for direct broadcasting of the proceedings. The appeal plea of KP is wrapped up being withdrawn. A 7-member larger bench of SC presided over by Justice Amin ul Din took up the case for hearing. Suleman Akram Raja counsel for PTI said the family is not being allowed to meet the accused persons since 5 weeks. Counsel Latif Khosa remarked the accused have been kept in bad circumstances. Justice Jamal Mandokhail inquired if meeting has not taken place then how it became known that they have been kept in adverse circumstances. The counsel replied the people who met earlier told that the hands of the accused were tied. Attorney General (AG) told the court the matter of meeting between the accused and their families had been resolved. Justice Jamal Mandokhail remarked the place was set ablaze where Quaid-e-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah had spent his last days.

Taxing targets

After setting a massive revenue target for the Federal Board of Revenue for the next fiscal year, the government seems to be building pressure on the tax authority to perform. It is just as well that this may lead to a tightening of the net around those who have so far managed to evade the taxman.

A day after another massive shakeup in the FBR, which reportedly saw the transfer of dozens of officers of the Inland Revenue Service and Customs Groups, and with more transfers and postings of senior officers expected over the weekend, the tax authority was told to immediately go after the around 4.5m citizens it had identified, which it thinks are liable to pay taxes but do not. The prime minister is also reportedly overseeing an accelerated action plan to digitise and reform the FBR, along with a review of its existing and required resources. These are all positive signs. Reportedly, Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif is serious about cracking down on corruption within the FBR, introducing a merit-based culture, and reforming the institution. Worryingly, however, he has involved two intelligence agencies, according to a report in local media, to 'assist' him in the task of identifying and penalising FBR officials.

Time will tell how successful this strategy will prove. The FBR has generally proven to be a difficult nut to crack for most past governments, with efforts to reform it invariably encountering resistance as soon as certain thresholds begin to be crossed. That said, it is clear to all and sundry that Pakistan's economic viability depends on the Board's ability to extract revenue in line with government policies and that the room for failure is no longer there. With the ongoing economic crisis, the need for a diligent tax authority has become an existential necessity for Islamabad.

The FBR's operational competencies aside, the fiscal policies, as outlined in the budget, have set it up for another huge challenge. It can expect to be reminded very soon that taxation is just as much a political issue as it is a fiscal concern. The FBR may begin executing the tax directives more diligently than before, but how will the government react when the various 'protected' classes once again begin agitating against its tax drives?

Not only that, the salaried classes, usually a lot easier to control, also seem to be in a black mood. Discussions on various social forums these days are increasingly turning to questions about why they should pay so much in taxes and if it isn't more sensible to be operating off the books. This is a dangerous sign for a government battling a crisis of legitimacy. How delicately and firmly it handles discontent will make or break its tax plans.

Maleeha Lodhi

The Shehbaz Sharif government faces multiple challenges — from the opposition, its political allies and from growing public discontent with a dire economic situation as people struggle with a cost-of-living crisis and the punishing burden of taxes. It also confronts a surge in security threats. How has the government managed so far to deal with these multiple fronts? Does it have a firm grip on the political, economic and security situation?

Dealing with PTI was never going to be easy. But it was a test of the government's political management skills to engage the opposition's parliamentary members in a way that minimised frequent disruptions of proceedings. However, with the party continuing to be the target of coercive actions by the authorities and their leader and activists in jail, PTI lawmakers have been in no mood to cease their protests in parliament and outside.

Despite a fleeting pause when the prime minister offered talks to the opposition — a move that was dead on arrival in the current fraught climate — there have been unending, bitter government-opposition clashes in the National Assembly. It has involved rejection by PTI lawmakers of the budget — as "anti-people" — as well as the government's other policy measures including its latest counterterrorism plan. Government ministers have also been lashing out at PTI in and out of the House. But neither has secured the upper hand in this confrontation. Instead, both have reached a virtual dead end in trying to prevail on the other. A tense and disorderly stalemate persists.

A 'normalised' relationship between the federal government and the PTI-run provincial government in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa is especially consequential for national stability. Issues concerning allocation of financial resources from the centre, adequate power supply and postings of officials remain a bone of contention between them. They need to be resolved for a proper working relationship to be established. Smooth working relations are also necessary for the robust execution of the federal government's counterterrorism campaign as its main theatre of operations is obviously in KP.

Governments always have more to lose from confrontational politics. Certainly, it has distracted the PML-N-led coalition from greater focus on governance. It has laid bare a style of leadership evidenced by the prime minister's dealings with allies, in which political engagement or negotiations are left to others. This reinforces his long-standing image as someone more comfortable being an administrator rather than a political leader; more at ease with bureaucrats than with politicians who he has to negotiate with. His not-so-frequent appearances in parliament also testify to this, which discourages ministers from showing up. This once prompted the elder Sharif, president of PML-N, to say the Shehbaz government should free itself from "bureaucratic influence".

Lack of consultation has emerged as a major grievance with the government by its principal political ally, the PPP. Although this complaint surpassed publicly at budget time, PPP leaders say it extends to the government's overall functioning and lack of structured and sustained consultation. It prompted PPP legislators to sharply criticise the budget and call it "directionless". Initially, the PPP threatened to boycott the budget session. Its lawmakers only agreed to participate after assurances by senior government leaders. Even so, PPP MNAs did not pull any punches in assailing budget proposals.

The Senate Standing Committee on Finance, chaired by a PPP senator, went so far as to call the budget against the national interest and in its report to the House called for withdrawal of several proposed measures. In his speech, PPP chairman Bilawal Bhutto-Zardari also took aim at budget proposals. Significantly he claimed the government had not fulfilled its commitment under the PML-N-PPP agreement, forged at the time of government formation, to consult his party on the budget and related decisions.

Despite its misgivings, the PPP voted for the budget. But not before some changes to the finance bill, although this was also in response to demands by the business community. In any case, the whole episode underlined fiftful management by the government of its relations with an ally without whose support it cannot survive in office. Of course, some of the PPP's complaints reflect political posturing to bargain for more from the government, such as its power-sharing demands in the Punjab government. Nevertheless, it suggests this would remain an uneasy and unpredictable relationship, especially as the government has preferred an ad hoc approach to managing it rather than an institutionalised one.

The budget was the first major test for the Shehbaz government. It evoked criticism across the board, from political parties, business community, media and the public at large. Having to meet IMF conditionalities to qualify for a new larger Fund loan programme provided the government no choice but to take painful adjustment measures. But the budget was an example of how to reward the elite and punish everyone else.

The Pakistan Business Council had this to say: "Sacred cows will graze freely while the golden geese will be cooked." Certainly, placing the burden of additional taxation on the salaried middle class marked a failure to equitably distribute the pain of adjustment, especially in view of the budget's pro-elite measures including salary increases for civil servants. This deepened public discontent at a time of mounting economic hardship, especially as increasing disruptions in power supply worsened people's plight at the peak of summer.

The government's lack of a communication strategy to explain budget measures and how they would extricate the country from the economic crisis contributed to public frustration. In fact, the government's weak communication on other counts too has denuded it of the ability to demonstrate it is running the affairs of state purposefully. Its response to the deteriorating security situation came on the heels of the public expression of concern by a senior Chinese official visiting Pakistan. -- Courtesy Dawn

Death and taxes

Umair Javed

The recently passed budget reveals three aspects about the present ruling regime. The first one is the external constraint of getting an IMF deal. It is clear that securing a new agreement, by any means necessary, is the primary motivation of decision-makers. The entire budget exercise seems to be working backwards from whatever targets have been communicated by the lender.

The second aspect is a hard domestic constraint. The ruling parties at the centre, especially PML-N, are fully aware of their nearly non-existent electoral legitimacy. Their uncertain position in power is thus far more reliant on the civil bureaucracy and the military establishment.

The third and final aspect is that the PML-N has made a decision that there is no need or urgency in the current moment to seek greater support among different groups in society, such as salaried individuals. Therefore, its primary impulse for whatever little space is left in the budget after the first two constraints is to reward the few narrow segments that may still be supporting them in some way. This primarily includes businesses working in the wholesale retail and other undocumented sectors.

It is worth exploring these three aspects turn by turn. While some of the economic mess is self-inflicted by the present regime, a large part of it is down to structural deficiencies in Pakistan's economy. A lack of productivity and the consequent inability to earn enough dollars means every government has a forex borrowing requirement, one which makes the IMF more or less indispensable in the current framework. Any government in this situation, at least one unwilling to take any radical steps, would have had to appease the external lender.

The external lender, in turn, makes a set of demands in terms of raising domestic revenue. In recent programmes, the demands have been specific when it comes to removing electricity price distortions and various forms of tax exemptions. This budget is mostly an outcome of these revenue-related demands.

If that external constraint informs the overall thrust of the budget, some of its internal workings reflect domestic realities. An increase in pensions and government officer salaries shows the entrenched control of the civil and military bureaucracy on financial decision-making. It is clear that the 'overdeveloped state', theorised by Hamza Alavi nearly 50 years ago, is still a valid way to describe the country. The 'permanent' state bequeathed by colonial rule is first and foremost interested in feeding itself rather than catering to any group in society.

The same reality is visible in the exemption offered in advance taxes on the sale of immovable property by civil and military officers, as well as in the numerous regulations showing government officers sanctioning perks and privileges for themselves. I am sure there are a few state officials who are doing their jobs for a range of pro-social and service-oriented objectives. But it is hard to ignore the fact that the vast majority now see the state as a means of securing upward mobility, greater social status, and generational wealth, even when it comes at the cost of greater immiseration for the rest.

This insatiable appetite is being catered to by a hybrid regime that is sustained by the (coercive) actions of state officials, rather than by the votes of citizens. Even if the regime politicians wanted to resist, and it is far from clear that they want to, they barely have any legs to stand on.

Finally, after the IMF's conditions and the state officials' own self-serving appetite, there is very little space left in the budget for anyone else's concerns. The first to be sacrificed is the white-collar salaried class in the formal sector. Recent estimates place the total number of this group, to which I too belong, at around two million individuals. Our unfortunate status as fully documented taxpayers serves as a convenient way to squeeze out more revenue, whenever required. This budget has taken full advantage of this, and will further contribute to downward mobility and decreasing living standards that have been the norm for the past few years. It is no wonder that every other conversation within this demographic is about foreign migration.

On the other hand, there are those who continue to operate in the informal sector, such as large swathes of the wholesale and retail sector and others engaged in real estate. Initial claims that the noose is being tightened around these groups as well turn out to be fairly hollow. All that was done is a further segmentation between filer, non-filer categories. Most businesses can get away with this by filing nil/null sales and income tax returns, or by turning to even more cash-based transactions. The number of wholesale-retail businesses is around 2.5m. Among these, a couple of hundred thousand are the larger ones, who hide turnovers and earn large returns. As former finance minister Miftah Ismail attempted, and a recent piece by economist Ammar Khan argued, it would have been relatively efficient to implement a fixed income tax regime through commercial electricity connections. That could have then been used as the first step towards greater documentation. Instead, the ruling party has made an explicit choice to protect its core support base, while subjecting every other group to greater taxation.

The budget has since passed and is now in force. An IMF deal will likely go through, which means more 'stabilisation' in the coming years, with anaemic growth. Barring some great challenge from the judiciary, the political landscape is expected to stay the same, with a regime held in place by force of the state rather than through popular support. It is then likely that the next few budgets will look the same as this one. No respite for the weary, with both economic death and taxes for the salaried class.

A trusted space

Huma Yusuf

At a recent anti-corruption conference, I briefly chatted with a Bolivian gentleman who is both an activist fighting corruption and convener of a network of librarians. My first instinct was to dismiss his involvement with libraries as an interesting hobby. But shortly after our encounter, it clicked: public access to information is the bedrock of anti-corruption, so why wouldn't the activist wear both hats?

I am not alone in forgetting the democratic underpinning of libraries. Due to their growing rarity, we tend to consider them ends unto themselves. They are sometimes treated like artefacts rather than civic spaces, the books inside reframed as relics from a literate past that must be preserved rather than sources of information that should be consumed, considered, challenged.

Often, our public discourse curtails libraries to their educative role — quiet places, typically on campuses, where students can use reference books or work without interruption. This is a critical function, but it misses the wood for the trees.

In a democratic context, libraries are places where citizens can access information that helps them make informed decisions about who to vote for, and that empowers them to hold those elected representatives to account. This conception assumes that libraries are public access, funded by the government in the spirit of making the democratic system work. And at its best, the concept does work: in a world of misinformation and polarisation, public libraries remain trusted places.

The world was reminded of their power in November 2023 when the Russians shelled the Kherson Regional Scientific Library in Ukraine. The library caught fire after the first rocket hit, and the Russians continued attacking it until it burned to the ground. The state-owned library boasted collections in 45 languages, many of which focused on the history and ethnography of southern Ukraine, including Russia's 2014 annexation of Crimea. The library's destruction was a political act, a strategic win in Russia's occupation effort; if information about Ukraine's history and society was unavailable, it was — literally and figuratively — up for grabs.

It is no wonder then that preserving and developing libraries is low on the priority list of the Pakistani state, which is more interested in suppressing inclusive politics and disempowering citizens. What hope can libraries have in a context where even social media musings are considered subversive and censored under any pretence? The information that public libraries offer, coupled with their ability to convene communities in real life, is a democratic force not to be taken lightly.

And so we have instead the proliferation of private libraries — those in the homes of the educated elite, in private clubs, private schools and universities, and those under the control of vested community groups.

Despite their private nature, this latter category continues to play a key democratic role, engaging local communities, providing access to otherwise obscured information, sparking debate through events, and, increasingly, providing digital access to world reference materials. But these spaces are dwindling and increasingly threatened.

This was evident in this paper's coverage of the Sayad Hashmi Reference Library, which is threatened by demolition as it falls on a proposed route for the Malir Expressway. Created and maintained through a communal effort, the library houses 16,000 books with a focus on Baloch literature and culture. Even as demolition day creeps closer, the authorities have yet to offer an alternative location for it. In a clear illustration of the political nature of libraries, its sponsors and supporters believe that this is due to its links to the Baloch community, with the razing of the library perceived as part of a broader effort to suppress that community's voice and access to information.

The idea of the library as a political battleground is not new in Pakistan. Some may recall the Western press's gushing coverage of a small library that popped up in Dara Adam Khel at the height of the TTP insurgency. A local graduate decided he did not want to join his father's gun shop and set up a small community library next door in the hope that reading would provide both understanding of and sanctuary from the region's collective trauma.

Such examples should not be one-offs. Given the mounting democratic challenges in our country, it is time for civil society to reprioritise the role of the library. And this may best be done by going back to basics and celebrating the joy of reading.

Reading, after all, engenders empathy, which is the starting point for all engagement, understanding and notions of fairness. And those qualities are the real fuel of functioning democracies. -- Courtesy Dawn

Poor livability

Dr Noman Ahmed

In a recent assessment of urban livability, the Economist Intelligence Unit rated Karachi as one of the world's least livable cities. The metropolis fared poorly in terms of stability, healthcare, education, culture, the environment and infrastructure. Karachi now compares with Lagos, Tripoli, Algiers and Damascus.

This is hardly surprising for Karachi residents, who are regularly subjected to power shutdowns, the absence of piped water, shortage of public transport, gas load-shedding, broken roads, street crime, toxic air quality, criminal tree-cutting, and other challenges. Despite these odds, the city remains the major contributor to national GDP and revenues from direct and indirect taxation.

Karachi has long been aspiring to a semi-autonomous governance model to address its issues. Barring the City District Government format under Gen Musharraf, this demand has not been realised. As a result of a controversial electoral process, 245 union committees, 25 town municipal corporations, and a metropolitan corporation came into existence about a year ago. All of them are still trying to find a visible role to play in managing Karachi's core affairs. With a limited financial base and executive capacity, people justifiably see these local government organs as mere cosmetic entities.

Karachi's political economy is complex. There are many overt and covert interest groups, who have their fingerprints all over the decisions pertaining to Karachi's development and management.

Local and international investors and developers attempt to safeguard everything that fuels their business. One observes endless land supply for investment, albeit at the cost of farmlands, fruit orchards, and indigenous settlements. The eviction of people in planned and unplanned localities is an ongoing nightmare. Whereas a few investors amass exponential profits, millions see their lives altered for the worse after forced displacements. The realtors are abetted in their projects by the provincial authorities, the city administration, and high-flying engineers, architects, contractors and service providers.

Utility agencies bend the rules to extend their services to these schemes. The mystery of the status of the K-4 Bulk Water Supply Scheme for over a decade is an example. To benefit privileged localities, K-4's right of way has been changed. A resident in Bahria Town receives uninterrupted water supply while another in Federal B Area has to run from pillar to post to access water.

To promote costly and state-subsidised buses on a few routes, the authorities have closed operations on many ordinary bus routes where city transporters offered their services at affordable prices. The Bus Rapid Transit is a joke. Constructed at an astronomical cost and inconveniencing residents, the BRT has been Karachi's most financially and operationally unviable transport option ever. If and when all seven BRT lines are operational, they will cater to only nine per cent of the total passenger trips. BRT beneficiaries will be IFIs, government officials, consultants and contractors. The losers will be Karachites.

There is a visible housing need in the city that remains unmet due to multiple reasons. For a very long time, the city has been functioning without a development plan with data on demographic trends at city scale, migrations, housing and infrastructure needs, and solutions to urban challenges. For the past many years, no public scheme for housing the urban poor has been announced, despite the fact that thousands of households are added to the existing tally every month.

Land in the peripheries, earmarked for housing low-income communities, has been given to a dubious mega realtor. As a result, existing low- and middle-income neighbourhoods are densifying fast. Single-storeyed yards on 80 or 120 square yards are being swiftly replaced with five- or six-storeyed structures. Most of these buildings are built without proper design and supervision. They are virtual death traps for the inhabitants. Many such buildings have already collapsed. Poor ventilation and lack of legal electricity connections make life miserable, especially for the elderly, women and children. Authorities only wake up in the event of an accident, conduct an inquiry and end up suspending a handful of officials.

To address all these concerns, the city's decision-making and governance mechanism must change. A broad-based steering committee under the Sindh chief minister and composed of representatives from stakeholder groups is needed. The body must be empowered to appraise city affairs and take appropriate decisions. Karachi's livability will not improve unless appropriate institutional arrangements are put in place to address the challenges faced by the residents. -- Courtesy Dawn

Saudi group to invest in retail Oil Sector in Pak

ISLAMABAD (APP): In a recent development, Saudi Group Asyad Holding through UAE-based Wafi Energy Holding Limited has acquired 77.42% shareholdings and control of Shell Pakistan Limited.

The Competition Commission of Pakistan (CCP) has approved the acquisition under Section 11 of the Competition Act, 2010, thus solidifying the said transaction to boost the retail oil sector in Pakistan, according to a press release issued here on Monday.

M/s Shell Pakistan Limited, listed on the Pakistan Stock Exchange, maintains a substantial business footprint in the retail supply of motor fuels and lubricants across Pakistan. Whereas, M/s Wafi Energy LLC is a wholly-owned affiliate of Asyad Holding Group which specializes in the management and operation of fuel stations in Saudi Arabia. The Group has established M/s Wafi Energy Holding Limited to flex its wings for investment purposes in Pakistan.

The CCP's Phase I competition assessment identified 'Retail Fuel, Vehicle Lubricants, and Industrial Lubricants' as the relevant product markets. It was also revealed that Shell Pakistan has distinct shares in all three relevant markets but that will remain unchanged post-transaction.

The analysis further confirmed that Wafi Energy Holding Limited will not gain a dominant position in the relevant markets even after attaining direct control of Shell Pakistan. Therefore, the CCP has swiftly authorized the said acquisition under Section 31 of the Competition Act, 2010.

Chairman CCP, Dr. Kabir Ahmed Sidhu, while signing the Order expressed that this development is expected to boost competition by elevating service standards in the retail fuel supply chain and thus, contribute immensely to flourishing Pakistani markets.

Pak-China Joint Lab for AI to intelligently Pakistan's agriculture

BEIJING (APP): In May, the Pakistan China Joint Lab for Artificial Intelligence and Smart Agriculture (AI&SA) has been established at the University of Agriculture Faisalabad (UAF).

Punjab Province, as Pakistan's main agricultural production area, its annual grain output accounts for about 76% of the country's total annual grain output.

Both parties agreed that it has unique advantages to carry out pilot applications of high-throughput crop monitoring projects here. In this province, about 600 farmers have joined the pilot application.

Dr. Iqar Ahmad Khan, Vice Chancellor UAF, noted lately that in the 25,000 villages across Punjab, if drone spraying technology could be adopted on a large scale, it will help increase productivity, reduce costs and greatly promote the development of intelligent agriculture. "We use drones equipped with visual recognition equipment to fly around the fields to achieve intelligent management of crop monitoring, cultivation management, pest and disease analysis, and agricultural production, including growth determination, crop health monitoring, water requirement analysis, fertilization, as well as pesticide application," Dr Wu Jun, the Chinese Director of the lab, introduced.

Mohammad Malik, a local farmer who has been growing wheat, sugarcane and other crops in Punjab for more than 30 years, is one of the participants in the pilot project. At first, he had many doubts about the project. "This technology is too complicated for farmers like me, and I doubt its effectiveness and practicality."

The project team members promptly explained it, "We could produce a text guide and audio-visual materials of the vegetation health map written in the local dialect and send them to your son's smartphone application."

NDMA convenes DRC meeting to strengthen coordination for Monsoon Season 2024

ISLAMABAD (APP): The first meeting of the Disaster Response Committee (DRC), constituted by the Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif, was held here on Monday at National Disaster Management Authority (NDMA) Headquarters. The committee was established to ensure effective coordination between the Federal and Provincial Governments in the context of national disaster response efforts, especially during the monsoon season and its associated hazards and risks.

The meeting was aimed to discuss and streamline strategies for proactive response plans to mitigate the impacts of potential monsoon-related emergencies. Discussions encompassed a range of topics, including the current state of preparedness, resource allocation, early warning systems, and community engagement strategies, a news release said.

The committee members also reviewed contingency plans including inter-agency communication, conducting joint training exercises and deploying resources to vulnerable regions to ensure a swift and coordinated response.

Chairman NDMA, Lieutenant General Inam Haider Malik briefed attendees about the projection by NDMA's NEOC about monsoon season and said that the establishment of the Disaster Response

Committee was a pivotal step towards strengthening our national disaster management framework.

"As we approach the monsoon season, it is imperative that we are well-prepared to address any potential emergency," he said and underlined the significance of reviewing stock positions for monsoon contingencies which was essential to undertake tangible actions before disasters strike. Minister for Planning, Development, and Special Initiatives, Ehsan Iqbal Chaudhry, (convener of the committee) presided the meeting and emphasized the critical importance of a cohesive and integrated approach to disaster management.

Tube wells' solarization in Balochistan to revamp agriculture: Governor

ISLAMABAD (APP): Governor Balochistan, Jaffar Khan Mandokhel on Monday hailed the prime minister for announcing historic Rs 55 billion project for solarization of 28,000 tube wells, stating that it will revamp agriculture sector at the province.

"A total of 28,000 agricultural tube wells across Balochistan will be converted to solar power within three months," the governor told PTV News.

Mandokhel noted that the project, costing Rs 55 billion, will see the federal government contributing 70% of the funds, with the remaining 30% provided by the provincial government.

He emphasized that uninterrupted power supply throughout the day would enhance farming efficiency and cultivate previously untapped agricultural potential.

The governor highlighted recent agreements signed between the federal and provincial governments, which according to him were expected to alleviate the challenges faced by farmers and facilitate the expansion of cultivable land.

Mandokhel highlighted the challenges faced by the province due to financial constraints and poor governance policies, pushing it towards underdevelopment.

Speaking on economic issues, the governor underscored the need to revive the National Finance Commission (NFC) Award to ensure equitable resource distribution among provinces, essential for Balochistan's development.

He also acknowledged the limitations of hydel power infrastructure in the province, attributing low power generation to the height of existing dams.

Regarding security and stability, Governor Mandokhel noted significant improvements in the law and order situation, highlighting its critical role in fostering prosperity.
