Do not let political differences turn into hatred, says Army Chief

General Asim Munir says the people of KP and Balochistan rendered "unprecedented sacrifices in the war against terrorism; Martyrs are the nation's identity and their families are a source of pride for Pakistan

RAWALPINDI (INP): On the 59th Defence Day of Pakistan, Chief of Army Staff (COAS) General Syed Asim Munir delivered a powerful message, paying tribute to the martyrs and reaffirming the unwavering resolve of Pakistan's armed forces to safeguard the nation's sovereignty.

Defence Day, observed annually on September 6, marks the victory of the Pakistani military during the 1965 war against India, a day of national pride and remembrance.

General Munir stated that the September 6 holds a "prominent position" in both national and military history. He lauded the spirit of national unity and solidarity displayed by the Pakistani people and armed forces during the war, which thwarted the enemy's ambitions and protected the homeland.

The COAS emphasized that this same spirit of unity continues to drive the Pakistan Army in its defence of the nation's borders.

In his message, General Munir paid homage to the martyrs who made the ultimate sacrifice to defend the country. "We salute the brave officers and men of Pakistan Army who sacrificed their lives for the motherland," he said, highlighting the Pakistan Army's commitment to ensuring the sanctity and protection of martyrs and their families. "Our martyrs are our top priority, and we will continue to safeguard their honour."

The army chief reiterated that the motto of the Pakistan Army—"Faith, Piety, and Jihad"—remains its greatest strength, enabling the military to counter any threats from enemies. He praised the unmatched bravery and professionalism of Pakistan's armed forces, not just in conventional warfare but also in countering the scourge of terrorism.

General Munir spoke about the ongoing fight against terrorism, noting that Pakistan's forces have achieved remarkable success in controlling the threat, which has no parallel globally. "The army of any other country has not been able to achieve the success with which our forces have contained the menace of terrorism," he stated, adding that thanks to the efforts of the security forces and law enforcement agencies, today Pakistan stands safe from instability.

However, the COAS also highlighted new and emerging challenges such as "digital terrorism" and the so-called 5th-generation warfare. He warned that these forms of terrorism, driven by the collaboration of foreign and anti-national elements, are more dangerous and complex than traditional terrorism.

Positive overtures

Better late than never, as they say. The ongoing unrest in Balochistan was finally raised from a humanitarian perspective on Wednesday, with various opposition leaders pushing for political solutions to the deepening crisis that has engulfed the province in recent days. Separately, representatives from both the government and the opposition also approached Akhtar Mengal, leader of his faction of the Balochistan National Party, to convince the veteran politician to rescind his resignation from the National Assembly and continue his advocacy and struggle for the rights of the people of his province through parliament. It appears that the announcement of Mr Mengal's decision to quit the assembly a day earlier was what finally shook the country's political leadership awake. It is hoped that the concerns he has raised regarding the worsening situation in Balochistan and its causes have been registered and will now be considered with all the seriousness they deserve.

It was particularly encouraging to note the political leaders refusing to frame Balochistan's problems in black and white. Instead, they also highlighted the policies that the state has imposed on the people of the province while denying them their right to self-representation and self-governance.

It is hoped that this is taken as a positive overture from the civilian leadership by the people of Balochistan, at a time when distrust between the state and the latter seems to be deepening at an accelerating pace. It was also positive that the political leaders present at the meeting of the Tehreek-i-Tahafuz-i-Ayeeen-i-Pakistan opposition alliance agreed on the need for a special sitting of parliament to discuss the situation in Balochistan. If it materialises, it should be offered as a platform for the voices of that province's citizens. It could release some of their pent-up frustrations and give the state some more time to correct its course there.

There is no doubt that the deteriorating security situation in the province needs urgent responses from the state. However, as has been seen in the past, unless these responses are carefully calibrated, they can cause a much bigger conflagration. The policies that have allowed resentment and disaffection to grow entrenched among the people of Balochistan are well-known and well-discussed. They must be discarded now. The Baloch people should be given the space in the political sphere they have long demanded from the state.

It has been deeply alarming to hear a Baloch nationalist like Mr Mengal, who chose mainstream politics instead of separatism, worry about the youth of Balochistan "taking to the mountains" because they have lost faith in democracy. Pakistan cannot afford for any of its young populations to be angry and disengaged. No nation can progress while a segment of its citizenry is kept from realising its potential. There is an urgent need for the state to acknowledge this.

Resilient abodes

Naseer Memon

In rural areas a house in most cases means a thatched hut built over ancestrally owned land without any supporting documents. Most of these houses are built either on empty public land or on the farm of a landlord where the family provides peasantry services against a paltry share of the harvest. These rickety structures are often made of straw, reeds, leaves, branches and trunks of trees. A better version is made of unbaked bricks covered with mud plaster. Such rickety structures are frequently battered by strong winds and seasonal heavy showers every year.

The Development Statistics of Sindh-2022 report issued by the Sindh Bureau of Statistics reveals that approximately 70 per cent of houses in rural areas are katcha. Housing data of five worst flood-hit districts in 2022 depicts abject poverty in these areas. Percentage of katcha houses in rural areas of some of the districts are: Dadu (56pc), Jamshoro (65pc), Qambar-Shahdadkot (65pc), Khairpur Mirs (51pc) and Mirpurkhas (71pc). Moreover, the report also reveals that 72pc of rural houses are just one-room structures. The recent census data of 2023 also confirms that 71.35pc of rural houses in Sindh are one-room structures. An astounding number of 268,371 jhugis/caves/tents have also been reported in rural areas. An average household size of 5.65 in Sindh puts the estimated number of dwellers in these primitive abodes to 1.5 million.

This explains how rural Sindh lost over 2.1m houses in the 2022 floods, rendering more than 12m people shelterless in 24 districts. Forty-eight per cent of the affecteds were women. Demographic profile of these hapless people reveals that most of them were living under extreme penury. According to the data of Sindh People's Housing for Flood Affecteds (SPHF) 94pc of the affecteds were earning hardly two dollars per day, including 31pc with income as meagre as one dollar per day.

Seldom has this scale of loss of housing stock of the poor occurred in a natural disaster. Rebuilding these structures on the principle of 'build back better' is an inevitable need and a gigantic task as well. Climate-proof housing is the cornerstone of creating resilient communities. Income levels of these affecteds are a testimony of their sheer abjection rendering them incapable of reconstructing their collapsed houses.

SPHF was established by the government of Sindh as an independent company to undertake this mammoth task of reconstructing over two million one-roomed flood-resilient pucca houses. In addition to engineering features, social augmentation of communities is the real transformative impact of such large-scale development projects. Half of the beneficiaries of this initiative are expected to get ownership titles of their houses. Half of them would be women, a stride forward towards empowerment of rural women.

So far, the project has mobilised over Rs550 billion through various funding agencies, including a contribution of Rs100bn equally shared by the federal and provincial governments.

Since financial transactions are made directly through the beneficiaries' bank accounts, the risk of conventional kickbacks has also been circumvented. Technical backup and social handholding is being facilitated through non-governmental organisations. These measures ensure transparency which is often compromised under the contractor model of public sector projects. SPHF claims that over 600,000 houses are at different stages of construction, including 200,000 that are fully constructed. Since the number of affecteds is enormous and the process of compliance is string-e-n-t, a sizeable population still await construction of their shelters. Never-the-less, considering the complexity and scale of the project, this is noteworthy progress.

Whereas a large number of families are expected to own an improved house, external infrastructure of these settlements continues to be a weaker link. A resilient house situated in a vulnerable settlement will remain prone to climate shocks. The scope of this initiative ought to be extended to create resilient settlements. Salient features of a climate-proof settlement encompass provision of clean drinking water, toilets, sewage network, paved streets, metalised link roads, protective dykes, emergency shelters and access to primary health and education.

Converting a flood disaster into an opportunity, it would be pertinent if the provincial government can implement a long-term project of upgrading all settlements as climate-resilient. Rural areas need a new approach towards settlements that can improve the lives of the masses, and give them at least a basic standard of living. -- Courtesy Dawn

Sorry syndrome

Zubeida Mustafa

The present is so gripping for us that we prefer to put our past on the back burner. But what happened in East Pakistan in 1970-71 remains fresh in the memories of the 50-plus generations. Most of them were directly or indirectly affected.

Hence in any discourse on Bangladesh in any context, attention eventually focuses on the happenings of those fateful years, which ended in the break-up of the country. That is how it turned out to be at the symposium on the political crisis in Bangladesh that was organised recently by the Pakistan Institute of International Affairs, Karachi. Initially, the speakers focused on the current developments in that country — the cause of the unrest and the challenges the interim government faces. We were informed about the similarities, and more the dissimilarities, in the political cultures of Pakistan and its erstwhile eastern wing.

What was striking, and quite understandably so, was the engagement of the audience with Bangladesh's past, which happens to be our history as well. The fact is that if you want to get a deeper insight into that country, you have to revisit the political controversies of 1947-1971 from the Bengalis' perspective.

It was hardly surprising when a woman in the audience raised the issue of the Pakistan government apologising to the people of Bangladesh for the past wrongs. Dr Masuma Hasan, who was presiding, explained that in his visit to Dhaka in 2002, General Pervez Musharraf had written in the visitors' book at the National Martyrs Memorial that the "excesses committed during the unfortunate period are regrettable". He also appealed to people to bury the past in a spirit of magnanimity.

I will not analyse the "I am sorry" syndrome here in the context of Bangladesh as the issue has been debated interminably. Besides, I am not certain if a candid analysis of its pros and cons in the current circumstances would even be appreciated by the powers that be.

Suffice it to say that the importance of etiquette and other social niceties in diplomatic and political dealings should always be considered on account of the advantages they offer in many situations. Thus, Ambassador Rafiuzzaman Siddiqi, who was posted as Pakistan's high commissioner in Dhaka in 2016 and was one of the speakers at the PIIA event, described his personal experience of the impact of such gestures. In August 2017 he decided to lay a wreath at Mujibur Rahman's memorial in Dhamondi on the anniversary of his death in a coup that had occurred 42 years earlier. "My gesture was widely welcomed by the Bangladeshis, especially the Awami League leadership," Mr Siddiqi recalled.

Here I would like to write about the practice of offering a formal apology in public life. It is unfortunate that we are not generous in the use of polite words such as 'thank you' and 'sorry' even in our private conversations. Our TV talk shows and the inscriptions on social media confirm my observation. Hence, I cannot say how many would have heard about the governments of Canada, Australia and New Zealand offering public apologies to the indigenous people living in their countries. The territories that ultimately became the above-named Dominions of the Commonwealth were not vacant land waiting to be occupied by outsiders. Many tribal groups were already living there when the foreigners arrived and disrupted the culture and the way of life of their hosts. This was a creeping colonisation of sorts.

The settlers displaced and exploited the indigenous owners of these lands and robbed them of their treasures and resources. The indigenous people suffered many indignities at the hands of their occupiers. The most brutal and inhuman measure inflicted on the locals by the outsiders was that of forcibly taking away the children from their parents on the pretext of 'civilising' them and teaching them the English language in order to socially assimilate them. With education and democratisation came the realisation that this was a gross violation of human rights; justice and reconciliation called for an apology and compensation.

By the 1990s, the resentment of the indigenous people was quite evident and the need for an apology was felt if the bitterness of the past had to be wiped out. After negotiations between the two sides, the terms of the apology and the amount of financial compensation to be paid were agreed upon.

Since the last few years the three governments have been holding ceremonies to apologise to different groups. Some may still be nursing grudges, but the impression we have is that the two sides are no longer at daggers drawn. If any disputes arise, the legal mechanism is available for the resolution of a dispute. -- Courtesy Dawn

Japan's Kishida, South Korea's Yoon call to sustain momentum in improved ties

Monitoring Desk
SEOUL: Japanese Prime Minister Fumio Kishida and South Korean President Yoon Suk Yeol called on Friday at a summit in Seoul to keep up the momentum behind an improvement in relations, which will be tested by imminent changes of leaders in Tokyo and Washington.

Kishida's final, whirlwind trip to his neighbour as prime minister came as the two leaders seek to seal their newfound partnership after orchestrating an about-face in ties, prodded by US President Joe Biden.

Relations between the two staunch US regional allies had sunk to their lowest level in decades amid acrimonious diplomatic and trade disputes over Japan's 1910-45 occupation of the Korean Peninsula.

Kishida emphasised the need to continue efforts to advance bilateral ties, once again expressing sympathy for Koreans who suffered during Japanese colonial rule.

"There is a lot of history ... but it is very important to inherit the efforts of our predecessors who overcame difficult times, and cooperate toward the future," Kishida told Yoon at the meeting.

"I've also said here in Seoul that I feel heartbroken that so many people have had such difficult, sad experiences in such difficult circumstances," he added, referring to his earlier comments during a visit last year.

Yoon also called for sustaining the positive momentum of cooperation built by the leaders, saying next year could provide "a turning point" for the relationship to take a leap forward marking its 60th anniversary. "There are still difficult issues remaining in Korea-Japan relations. I hope that both sides will continue to work together with a forward-looking attitude so that we can continue to take steps toward a brighter future."

The two welcomed the signing of an agreement to facilitate the evacuation of each others' citizens from an emergency in a third country, which Kishida called a symbol of growing trust.

They also agreed to work together to simplify immigration procedures for travellers, and ensure that North Korea cannot utilise Russia's backing to stage more provocations, according to Yoon's deputy national security adviser, Kim Tae-hyo.

Kishida has announced he will step down this month and Japan's governing Liberal Democratic Party will hold elections on Sept 27 to choose his successor.

He is due to return to Tokyo on Saturday after dining with Yoon on Friday night, their offices said.

Yoon has made it a diplomatic priority to mend ties with Tokyo and improve security cooperation including with Washington to tackle North Korea's military threats, which led to a historic trilateral summit at Camp David last year.

US-Iraq deal would see hundreds of troops withdraw in first year, sources say

Monitoring Desk
BAGHDAD: The United States and Iraq have reached an understanding on plans for the withdrawal of U.S.-led coalition forces from Iraq, according to multiple sources familiar with the matter.

The plan, which has been broadly agreed but requires a final go-ahead from both capitals and an announcement date, would see hundreds of troops leave by September 2025, with the remainder departing by the end of 2026, the sources said.

"We have an agreement, it's now just a question of when to announce it," a senior U.S. official said.

The U.S. and Iraq are also seeking to establish a new advisory relationship that could see some U.S. troops remain in Iraq after the drawdown.

An official announcement was initially scheduled for weeks ago but was postponed due to regional escalation related to Israel's war in Gaza and to iron out some remaining details, the sources said.

The sources include five U.S. officials, two officials from other coalition nations, and three Iraqi officials, all speaking on condition of anonymity as they were not authorized to discuss the matter publicly. Several sources said the deal could be announced this month.

Israeli forces pull out of Jenin leaving a trail of destruction

Monitoring Desk
JENIN: Israeli forces pulled out of the Palestinian city of Jenin on Friday, leaving a mass of damaged buildings and infrastructure, following one of the biggest security operations in the occupied West Bank in months. Road diggers began clearing piles of debris and rubble left by the operation, which involved hundreds of troops and police backed by helicopters and drones entering all areas of the city and the adjacent refugee camp as well as surrounding villages.

Thousands of residents were displaced from their homes during the nine-day operation, during which troops fought running gunbattles with Palestinian fighters from factions including Hamas and Islamic Jihad and Fatah.

"When they entered, they used bulldozers and began destroying everything. They left nothing," said Jenin resident Samaher Abu Nassa. Water and electricity services remain cut and around 20 km of roadway was dug up by Israeli bulldozers, a tactic the military said was aimed at neutralizing roadside bombs but which has ripped up much of the centre of the city.

The Palestinian foreign ministry accused the military of transferring the tactics used to level the Gaza Strip into the West Bank. Jenin, in the northern part of the West Bank, has long been a stronghold of Palestinian armed factions, and the Israeli military said the operation, which also targeted the city of Tulkarm, was aimed at thwarting Iranian-backed militant groups planning attacks on Israeli civilians.

It said troops had killed 14 militant fighters during the operation, including the local commander of Hamas in Jenin. Forces also arrested 30 suspects and confiscated weapons and dismantled infrastructure including an underground weapons storage depot underneath a mosque and an explosives workshop.
