50,000 new passport applications being received daily: Interior Ministry

ISLAMABAD (INP): Interior Ministry has reported a surge in passport applications, with 45,000 to 50,000 applications submitted daily, while current resources allow only 20,000 to 22,000 passports to be issued per day.

Officials attribute the delays to limited capacity and outdated infrastructure.

In a statement to the National Assembly, Interior Minister Syed Mohsin Raza Naqvi explained that the system introduced in 2004 was initially sufficient but has since become strained as regional offices expanded from 30 to 223 and foreign missions from 10 to 93. He said over time, the passport offices increased to 223 while Pakistan's missions abroad surged to 93. However, he said the passport production facility was never expanded nor equipped with the technology or equipment to make the printing process "faster and better."

"Presently, the department is facing a very high trend of daily passport applications around 45,000 to 50,000 thousand from field formations, whereas, the production facility can merely cater for 20,000 to 22,000 passports per day," Naqvi said. "Resultantly, the routine backlog is being accumulated."

Wave of violence

Another wave of violence is cresting in KP. The past few days have seen multiple attacks that have claimed the lives of a number of security personnel.

On Saturday, eight people, including four policemen and two security officials, were martyred in a suicide blast in North Waziristan. An earlier attack took place in Darazinda, in D.I. Khan district, on Thursday night, when militants stormed a checkpoint and martyred 10 Frontier Constabulary men. The attack, claimed by the banned TTP, was portrayed as 'revenge' for a successful operation a day earlier in which nine militants, had been neutralised by security forces, who have stepped up their operations following the resurgence of terrorism.

This is a time when our forces should be highly vigilant and prepared for the enemy to strike from any quarter. They should also take the fight to the enemy with the support of the civilian population residing in hotspots for militant activity, who may be willing to aid the effort as they are weary of the constant violence.

The rising count of security personnel martyred in terrorist attacks has remained a cause of concern. Among those martyred in the recent attacks was a young off-duty cadet, aged only 19, who was slain in an assault on a Lakki Marwat mosque. It has been reported that the young man fought off the terrorists, laying down his life while saving many others in the process.

It is saddening to contemplate the loss of a life so young, and it compels one to ask how many more soldiers we will lose to such dastardly attacks before the state devises a coherent response mechanism to terrorist outfits, which are growing bolder by the day. It has been argued that Pakistan needs a dedicated counterterrorism force to meet terrorists in asymmetric warfare, as its regular forces are trained to fulfil a different responsibility and equipped with a different skillset. The recent spate of violence has highlighted this need further.

Things have lately been tense in the province due to a three-way stand-off between terrorist outfits, the citizenry and security forces. If recurrent incidents of violence are left unchecked, they will further erode people's confidence in the state and its ability to maintain peace and provide security to its citizens.

The state must, therefore, move immediately and decisively to wrest back control. While doing so, it must consciously avoid taking any action or decision that may antagonise the citizenry and, consequently, create unnecessary hurdles in the implementation of its policy measures. On the other hand, the civilian leadership of the province must take responsibility for generating a political consensus on how the threat is to be tackled. A concerted effort is needed to rid the country of this menace.

Gwadar development

Dr Noman Ahmed

Recently, the Chinese and Pakistani prime ministers inaugurated the Gwadar International Airport — virtually from Islamabad. From a development perspective, the airport is a useful addition and set to enhance the aerial connectivity of the emerging port city with the larger region. Better aviation facilities will allow both domestic and foreign visitors to conveniently access Gwadar. The airport shall also enable a swift response to disasters — recall the rain and flooding in Gwadar not too long ago.

However, despite this and other infrastructural development initiatives, Gwadar's overall progress appears stymied — even though the city was touted as a core beneficiary of CPEC for over a decade. Its privileged position in this context is clear from the extension and consolidation of the port infrastructure, projects related to freshwater generation and distribution, the Pak China Friendship Hospital, a technical and vocational institute, as well as the preparation of the Gwadar smart port city master plan. So, when so much development work is being carried out, why do the residents of Gwadar and its adjacent areas seem unhappy?

A study by the Pakistan Poverty Alleviation Fund reveals that Gwadar is lagging behind in almost all core social indicators. Only 21 per cent of small children have been immunised; 25pc of children of school-going age are out of school — 46pc of these are girls; 46pc of schools in the district do not have functional toilets; drinking water is available in only 51pc of the schools.

Besides, housing quality is extremely dismal. Only 5pc of homes are constructed with reinforced concrete, while others are built with mud and other unsuitable material. Only 18pc of residents have access to gas; most use firewood, kerosene and charcoal as fuel.

Livelihood conditions are also challenging. Over two-thirds of the people are directly or indirectly connected with fishing, net repairs, boat construction and repairs, transportation, storage of the catch of the day, etc. The people barely live above subsistence level, and have no opportunity to build assets to improve their lives.

The sale and purchase of developed, semi-developed and underdeveloped land is another visible enterprise. People with financial resources are able to monopolise the acquisition of land for future utilisation and investment purposes. It is of little benefit to ordinary folk who neither have savings nor the capacity to undertake land development ventures. The recent rains and flash floods have caused colossal damage to the life and property of people in the district and beyond. Many households are still reeling from the after-effects.

The worsening law and order situation has compounded the miseries of Gwadar's residents. It is common for unknown assailants to emerge from nowhere, kill and maim innocent people, and then disappear. The regular police control a fraction of the district. The Levies, Frontier Constabulary and other formations are entrusted with the responsibility of securing the area.

More than seven decades of political alienation, mistrust between the state and the people, and the presence of clan-based agents of external invisible powers continue to haunt society.

When acts of violence and disturbance cease, an uneasy calm prevails. Scores of missing people — young and elderly — are a lingering legacy in almost every household. The new leadership, whether in the form of the Haq Do Tehreek or the Baloch Yakjehti Committee, are at the forefront of the political and social dynamics of Gwadar and larger Balochistan.

With practically no voice in matters of local governance or the day-to-day running of the area, the people of Gwadar often consider the emblems of re-regional development — such as the new airport or port complex — as a rude joke. Whether it was the PPP party's Aghazi-Huqooq-i-Balochistan package or subsequent development dole-outs, little to no benefit has trickled down to the common folk due to the unresolved discord between the core stakeholders.

Saner voices have suggested that the only way forward to ensure real development in Gwadar is for the authorities to engage with the local people in a serious and meaningful way. Development priorities must be set in accordance with the wishes and aspirations of the public.

A small step in this direction could be the launch of ventures to support the local fishermen and boating community. Building cold storages for their catch, constructing boat repair yards and upscaling fishing jetties can be the first step. Locational choices must be made where the fishermen have an advantage. The city's master plan must yield to local preferences in land utilisation. It is the residents of Gwadar who must win. -- Courtesy Dawn

The Muslim vote

Huma Yusuf

As the US election approaches, a question dominates the news cycle: how will Muslim Americans vote? Muslims comprise one per cent of the US population, but are a key constituency in hotly contested states such as Michigan and Pennsylvania. They are single-issue voters this year — Gaza.

American Muslims are dismayed by the Biden-Harris administration's handling of the horrific war in Gaza, and feel dehumanised by the plight of Palestinians. But they have not forgotten former US president Donald Trump's 'Muslim ban' and the Republicans' inherent post-9/11 Islamophobia. Will they choose the lesser of two evils, or walk away from the process?

Polling suggests around 29.4pc will vote for Kamala Harris. This is bad news for the Democrats — 65 to 80pc of American Muslims voted for Hillary Clinton and Joe Biden in 2016 and 2020, while 80 to 92pc voted for Barack Obama in 2008 and 2012. Muslim Americans who reject Harris may vote for Trump or a third candidate or abstain altogether.

Muslim Americans' voting predicament may strike a chord for Pakistan's liberal left, which is facing criticism for failing to push back against anti-democratic forces, most recently manifest in the passage of the 26th Amendment. The more captured our state institutions are, the less democratically minded people engage with them. Those who participate in the system are seen as complicit in its degradation. But opting out is tantamount to surrendering our democracy. What's a liberal to do?

Perhaps we can learn some lessons from Muslim Americans.

Don't stop engaging: Muslim Americans respect the power of their votes. Their electoral handwriting is informed, grounded in a detailed understanding of both sides' policies.

Don't fear debate: The Muslim American constituency's views are divided, as captured in a Wisdom of Crowds debate featuring Shadi Hamid and Haroon Moghul. Hamid is stifling the urge to punish the Democrats for supporting Israel's atrocities in Gaza. He's voting for Harris to minimise the overall harm to US democracy that would result from a Trump victory, and because he believes that pro-Palestine voices could find space in a Harris administration and continue to fight from within the system. Moghul, on the other hand, plans to abstain, because he cannot in conscience support a party that has facilitated war crimes.

The commentators disagree, but they're still talking to each other, and remain focused on the shared goals of defending Palestinian rights and strengthening US democracy. Pakistanis who seek the withdrawal of the military from public life are polarised and critical of each other's approaches. They would benefit from constructive debate and collaboration.

Think in terms of institutions rather than individuals: Moghul's criticism of the Democratic Party is largely grounded in principle — the idea that the party is not obeying the rules of democracy. Americans have not voted for the US's growing involvement in the Middle Eastern conflict and, in fact, oppose foreign interventions. The Democrat policy over the past year has even ignored its own members' preferences (77pc oppose the US sending arms to Israel). Focusing on institutions and systems enables sub-groups to identify common goals, rather than fragment on the basis of individual preference.

Go local: Moghul won't vote for either presidential candidate, but will support local and state-level candidates. He's rejecting party leaders, not the democratic system. In Pakistan too, the best counter to elite state capture is to revitalise local government. This must be a key priority of democracy activists.

Think long-term movement not short-term victories: In their failure to influence the US's Middle East policies, American Muslims are re-aligning they have not, in Hamid's words, created "countervailing incentives" to respond to "the structural incentives that reward pro-Israel positions". This despite the recent political ascendancy of American Muslims: Keith Ellison became the first Muslim Congressman in 2006 — by 2016 US representatives included Somali refugee Ihan Omar and second-generation Palestinian Rashida Tlaib.

In Pakistan, we rally around individuals elevated as democratic saviours. Ours is a politics of emotion, not organisation. The hard slog of building a political movement does not come easy. This is because we are not trained on building democratic systems from the outset. As our state institutions are weakened we should go back to the basics: teach civics at school and empower student unions at university campuses. Systems are best changed from the bottom up, and from within. No matter who wins the US election, Muslim American political participation should endure. -- Courtesy Dawn

Netanyahu says strikes on Iran 'hit hard' as war on Gaza, Lebanon rages

Monitoring Desk
JERUSALEM: Israel's air strikes "hit hard" Iran's defences and missile production, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said, but Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said the damage from Saturday's attack should not be exaggerated.

With warfare raging in Gaza and Lebanon, direct confrontation between Israel and Iran risks spiralling into a regional conflagration. But a day after the air strikes, there was no sign they would spark another round of escalation.

However, heavy fighting in Lebanon between Israeli forces and Iran-backed Hezbollah, which sharply intensified over recent weeks, continued on Sunday with an Israeli airstrike killing eight people in a residential block in Sidon, medicals said.

"The air force attacked throughout Iran. We hit hard Iran's defence capabilities and its ability to produce missiles that are aimed at us," Netanyahu said in a speech, calling the attack "precise and powerful" and saying it met all its objectives.

The Islamic Republic has not signalled how it will respond to Saturday's long-anticipated strikes, which involved scores of fighter jets bombing targets near the capital Tehran and in the western provinces of Ilam and Khuzestan.

The heavily armed arch-enemies have engaged in a cycle of retaliatory moves against each other for months, with Saturday's strike coming after an Iranian missile barrage on Oct 1, much of which Israel said was downed by its air defences. Khamenei said Israel's calculations "should be disrupted". The attack on Iran, which killed four soldiers and caused some damage, "should neither be downplayed nor exaggerated", he said.

The Iranian parliament speaker, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, said Iran was entitled to self-defence and its response "will be definite, in compliance with the

Sudanese need protection, but conditions not right for UN force, says Guterres

Monitoring Desk
UNITED NATIONS: United Nations Secretary-General Antonio Guterres appealed to the Security Council on Monday for its support to help protect civilians in war-torn Sudan, but said conditions are not right for deployment of a UN force.

"The people of Sudan are living through a nightmare of violence — with thousands of civilians killed, and countless others facing unspeakable atrocities, including widespread rape and sexual assaults," Guterres told the 15-member council.

War erupted in mid-April 2023 from a power struggle between the Sudanese army and the paramilitary Rapid Support Forces ahead of a planned transition to civilian rule, and triggered the world's largest displacement crisis.

"Sudan is, once again, rapidly becoming a nightmare of mass ethnic violence," Guterres said, referring to a conflict in Sudan's Darfur region about 20 years ago that led to the International Criminal Court charging former Sudanese leaders with genocide and crimes against humanity.

France hijab bans in sports 'discriminatory': UN experts
